Below is the excerpts from a Q&A with Dr. Utomi on how the National Policy on Education has worked in Nigeria, and the steps that need to be taken by the states and the Federal Government to make it a reality. How the National Policy on Education helped in the national discourse on education? The primary reason why we needed the NP was to create an awareness of the issues surrounding education. We needed to have a national discussion on education so that we can have a foundation for subsequent generation. Let us be honest, no one had such a national debate on education, and so we needed a policy that could get us there. How did you first start thinking about the NP? It was after the VP's speech in which he talked about the need to address education. It was also after I came back from the UN World Education Forum last year.

We sat down together and I started thinking about what was wrong with education in Nigeria. I started to talk about it and we mapped out the process of what needed to be done. Also, we thought about what the principal's role is, and what the role of the principals should be. What are the five biggest challenges the NP faces? The biggest challenge is that the Board of Trustees of the NP, that is the Federal Government, did not recognize the NP as it stands, thus many of the Boards are still sending correspondence to me, which they shouldn't be doing, because the NP is coming from the Federal Government. They should ask the Federal Government for their reactions. I also found that the policy is not inclusive, though it is supposed to be. People without a special interest in education do not feel empowered to send letters to the Board. It's about change, and we are beginning to get there. It will take time but we are moving. Another major challenge is that we have about one third of the states that have not agreed to the policy. And we 3da54e8ca3
